

Different fields of Photography

Stock Photography- The photographer takes photos of various subject matter and offers them for sale to any interested client, be they a magazine, advertising company, etc.

Portrait Photography- Involves both on location and in studio shooting... sometimes both for the same client.

Fine Art Photography- A photographer sells his or her work, usually through a gallery. These prints are photography for photography's sake

Studio Photography- This is usually photography done for a client for use in an advertisement. It is also known as a product shot. Time is spent on getting the correct lighting and the “perfect” shot. Could be shoes, food, hairspray... the list goes on and on.

Wildlife/ nature photography- These photographers take shots of wildlife, or remote areas. The prints are either used as fine art photos and sold in galleries, or sold to magazines either directly or through stock agencies.

Photojournalism/ Editorial photography- These photographers are either employed by a news agency, or a publication, and may have to forfeit rights to their pictures, (they may be on a contract or freelance basis.) These photographers often travel, one of the perks of the job. As we will see, this can morph quickly into cultural anthropology.
